Is the world ready for integrated healthcare?

The world is growing

And as the new Future Health Index report reveals, healthcare systems are beginning to change with it.

Patients and Healthcare professionals in 13 countries were asked for their views on how prepared their national health systems are to address future health challenges...

The results show an index of 56.5

The level of readiness varies across countries

But emerging countries are blazing a trail for technology

Healthcare professionals in emerging economies are more likely to believe in the importance of connected digital technologies which will drive healthcare transformation.

60% of patients own or use connected care technologies

79% of older generations take full responsibility for being healthy

85% of healthcare professionals believe a better integrated health system is the answer to better care

Compared with 66% of those aged 18-34

And most people believe a better integrated health system is the answer to better care

"It is encouraging to see many nations are starting from a reasonably strong position in their readiness to adopt the connected digital technologies which will ultimately drive healthcare transformation.

Frans van Houten, CEO of Royal Philips

But emerging countries are blazing a trail for technology

Healthcare professionals in emerging economies are more likely to believe in the importance of connected digital technologies which will drive healthcare transformation.

60% of patients own or use connected care technologies

79% of older generations take full responsibility for being healthy

85% of healthcare professionals believe a better integrated health system is the answer to better care

Compared with 66% of those aged 18-34

And most people believe a better integrated health system is the answer to better care

"It is encouraging to see many nations are starting from a reasonably strong position in their readiness to adopt the connected digital technologies which will ultimately drive healthcare transformation.

Frans van Houten, CEO of Royal Philips